Tackling Climate Change in Kangirsuk

Project highlights

- The project started with elder interviews and a berry picking outing. This series of interviews and land expeditions helped students to better understand climate challenges in connection with Inuit land knowledge and wisdom
- Students watched climate change documentaries, which sparked a passion about climate change.
- Students created a greenhouse in the classroom in response to the climate change challenge, growing different types of plants and learning from trial and error.

A group of people, likely students, are shown in a snowy, mountainous landscape. They are wearing heavy winter clothing, including jackets and hats. The scene is set in a cold, outdoor environment with snow-covered ground and mountains in the background.

Building up local tourism infrastructure in Kangiqsujuaq

Project highlights

- In Kangiqsujuaq, a popular tourist destination in Nunavik, CCD students worked on the concept for a local tourism business in partnership with local organizations, offering various packages.
- Students participated in many land expeditions, local business visits, cultural activities, and interviews with local elders.
- Other smaller projects included building a compost bin for the NV out of wood pallets and planning the set-up of a visitors centre where they would host visitors for tea, information, etc.
